

Dr. Ron Dillow

Q: I had a tooth come out of my denture. It is almost 15 years old, but fits fine. I am 64 years old and will retire soon. Should I have this repaired or wait until I'm on Medicare to replace my denture?

A: Currently, Medicare does not cover dentures. It can be a difficult decision to replace something that is giving you good service. Your denture could be repaired, but at its age, more repairs are probably just around the corner.

If you are currently working and especially if you still have dental benefits, replacement now might be the smartest decision. The cost of a new denture when you are on a retirement income might be difficult to budget.

I always offer a free repair of the old denture when I start a new one for my patients. That way they have a back-up spare when we are done.
