Q: I have seven remaining lower teeth that look bad. My upper denture works really well for me. Should I just have these pulled and a denture made?

A: The decision to remove the last remaining teeth is an important one. Once the teeth are removed, they are not coming back.

It is true that while many people function very well with an upper denture, many also struggle with a lower denture. If there is good bone support, these teeth can be made to look good again and last a long time.

If a denture is made for the lower, be sure to have a snap in denture made. I have been making these for many years and they solve many problems for lower denture wearers.

For most patients, everything is done right here in our office.
